I'm kind of sad that "lik the bred" form is mostly on the decline because it's fucking nuts

It's actually a pretty strict form. You gotta spell shit phonetically, it has a specific meter and rhyme scheme (think I just reblogged a post that called it iambic dimeter)....

It's just wild to me that free verse is such a Thing in modern poetry and yet this fucking form just sprung up as a meme and I think it's pretty great.

Maybe I should write a bunch of lik the bred poems and try to get it published :P

bestbredlik

I feel like I ought to know this as a collector of bredlik poems, but what exactly is the rhyme scheme that most of them follow? I've got the iambic dimeter part down, but the rhyme didn't seem to be consistent across many of them.

If you couldn't tell already, I am very fond of bredlik poems and also enjoy the way structure interacts with the content.

Poem: I lik the form

My naym is pome / and lo my form is fix'd
Tho peepel say / that structure is a jail
I am my best / when formats are not mix'd
Wen poits play / subversions often fail

Stik out their tounge / to rebel with no cause
At ruls and norms / In ignorance they call:
My words are free / Defying lit'rate laws
To lik the forms / brings ruin on us all

A sonnet I / the noblest lit'rate verse
And ruls me bind / to paths that Shakespeare paved Iambic fot / allusions well dispersed
On my behind / I stately sit and wave

You think me tame /
Fenced-in and penned / bespelled
I bide my time /
I twist the end / like hell

* "lik" should be read as "lick"; not "like". In general, the initial section on each line should be read sort of phonetically.

Written for World Poetry Day, March 21, 2018. When I had this idea earlier today, I thought it was the worst, most faux hip pretentious idea for a shallow demonstration of empty wordsmithing skill in poetry ever. So I had to try to write it. I mean, how often do you get to fuse the iambic dimeter of bredlik - one of the newest and most exciting verse forms - with the stately iambic pentameter of the classic sonnet?

A 22-month-old female scaredy cat tiger appeared to get the shock of her young life when she encountered a dead leaf floating on a pool of water in the Bandhavgarh National Park, India. Clearly unsure about just what was approaching her, the partially submerged youngster's tail shot up in the air and with teeth bared she let out her most fearsome growl - all in an effort to scare the humble leaf away.

So "my name is Cow... i lik the bred" seems to be the Hot New Meme, and I like it. Here's an odd thing about it, though; a lot of the cutsey animal talk I see on the internet (especially birb-speak) sometimes reminds me of Middle English, but "lik the bred" takes it even further and sounds downright Chaucerian, and it isn't just the rhyme and cadence. Some of the "lik the bred" pastiches I see around don't really work because they're in just plain doggo-fran speak (haven't decided if Doggo-fran and Birb are the same thing or not), but the ones that really hit all the same notes as the original have something going on with the mangled vowels and spelling that's not the same as the mangling in Doggo and/or Birb. Maybe some time I'll gather up some examples and look closely at the vowels and spelling and try and sort out precisely what's up.

Re: the OP - I don't think Doggo-fran and Birb-speak are the same at all, but it's tricky to articulate why (probably because I'm not actually a linguist).

I think Doggo-fran revolves around intentionally switching out syllables in words (or adding them onto mono-syllabic words) - although actually I'm not sure precisely what @runecestershire is referring to here but the other thing that comes to mind is the 'bork' meme speak which revolves mostly around the nonsense sentence structure 'you are doing me a [verb]'. Both cases seem to me to be a lot more specific in usage than Birb-speak.

Birb-speak revolves more around intentionally bad spelling and grammar, often with an overblown sense of urgency to imitate something being typed (and thus spoken) loudly, at high speed and with little accuracy (although there are two slightly different memetic forms of Birb-speak - one originating from the @probirdrights Twitter and the other from the @importantbirds Tumblr and their styles, while similar, are not identical).

But the OP is indeed correct that proper-sounding 'i lik the bred' poems have a very specific structure and language to them which is distinct again from the other examples.

false-senpai Follow

I have also noticed this! I thought I was alone in thinking they sounded like middle english!!

A few of the spellings used in the “i lik the bred” poems are almost exactly the same as those in my Chaucer text.

blueandbluer Follow

I thought this too...

nuggetemily

this whole time i thought making it sound like middle english was like, the entire point because the first time i saw it was in a post about a ren faire

severalowls Follow

Yeah, the origin is the renn faire post so I think it is absolutely intentional that it sounds/reads more archaic than anything else. It's got some of the same qualities as other animal-speak memes (all the way back to lolcats) except this cow is from ye olden days.

This is just to say

I have eaten

the spiders
that were in my cave

and which you were probably counting
for statistical purposes

Forgive me
I am an outlier
adn
should not have been counted

the-real-seebs Follow

"Average poem parodied three times a year" factoid is actually statistical error. Average poem is parodied 0 times a year. This is Just To Say by William Carlos Williams, which is not a metaphor for Plato's cave and is parodied over 10,000 times each day, is an outlier and should not have been counted.

I'm not sure when this bottom bit here got added but it really is the best addition to my post I've ever seen.

adn wen you cownt
or tally up
the hole amownt

of spyders ayt
by men, do not cownt those i eet -
i eet a lot.

When I saw "Georg" and "cownt" I pattern-matched to the wrong Georg:

My name is Georg
and wen you cownt
the reals you'll miss
a great amownt
You write em down
and think they fits
the diagonal -
I flip the bits

I think this one's even better than mine.
